Estimated half of the workers are not covered by collective agreements, which is an increase over the last years, and a majority works on part-time contracts. Even if the part-time contracts are paid according to the hourly pay of the agreement, many workers do not have enough weekly hours to make a living wage in the sector. During the last collective bargaining rounds the social partners to the agreement have tried to secure wage and working conditions in the sector in trying to deal with precariousness. To this end, in 2017, three initiatives were taken: (1) Two new integrative wage schemes for new labour market entrants, (2) new rights for a collective agreed sector-wide wage supplement, and (3) new opportunities for company-based wage bargaining.

		In 2017, the sectoral social partners agreed upon a new collective agreement, coming into force in December 2021, and a new wage agreement for the sector, with the most important change being the reform of the job classification system (into eight occupational groups with five stages each, abolishment of formerly 2 wage areas). The 'new' agreement is valid from 1 December 2017 with a transition period of four years, i.e. all around 40,000 companies in the sector can choose on every first of the month until 1 December 2021 to change into the new system (or remain in the old one). By 1 December 2021, all companies must apply the new wage agreement. For the time being, separate minimum pay levels for the new and old agreement apply. According to union information, the large retail chains in the sector still adhere to the 'old' system, covering a large share of the sectoral workers. Thus, minimum levels for the old agreement are given above.
